

1. Shut up, eliminate distractions and listen

You can't learn from others when you're too busy hearing yourself talk or constantly consumed by your devices. Be present, and focus your attention on whoever has the floor. Listening is top as well as one of the most under rated skill that people seriously need to polish.

2. Difference between being Educated and Instructed

I see often people interchangeably use these terms, in real both are unique while one being more valuable than the other i.e. Education. Anyone can be taught the technical skills of a job, but it's near-impossible to teach someone all the critical life skills associated with a strong, generalized college education – skills such as close reading, being resourceful, humble, evaluating ideas systematically, thinking creatively, and collaborating productively.

3. Spend time with different kinds of people

Cherish your once-in-a-lifetime proximity to thousands of peers who don't look like you, don't think like you, have different skills, have distinct motivations, and are still inspired by life. Your college probably has a hand-crafted level of diversity, so being surrounded by all kinds of people may seem normal to you now. But it's probably not going to be that way in the real world, even if you end up in a major city. So take every opportunity to spend time with all these unique characters. You'll learn as much from them as you will from your academic endeavours. In the end of it “You will discover yourself”.

4. Push your limits in college time

Even I am a college student and I see lot of other students misguided to be carefree in this time, Where they really should be encouraged to be the best version of themselves and take chances in this Win-Win scenario. It's frustrating to me that so many students pay thousands of dollars a year just to drink, smoke, and slack off in class. By all means, have a blast when you've earned it, but the last thing you want to do is drown yourself in student debt with ultimately no skills to show for. You'll inevitably make mistakes, but the beauty of college is that no one cares about these micro-failures after your graduate. So push yourself – you'll be seriously surprised how much you're capable of.

- Himanshu Khatri