The problems posed by refuse, not least the disposal of human excrement, animal dung and animal by-products discarded by butchers and tanners, were of tremendous concern to most of the citizens of Dublin. Pigs and cows wandering around the streets added very considerably to the problem and constituted a real menace to life and limb. He discusses the merchants at the heart of this commerce, and their interrelationships.
Yet Slattery reveals that in the Dublin city franchise roll for — there are records of 71 women who completed apprenticeships—with a merchant, armourer, butcher, clerk, cook, corviser, glover, justice, painter, smith, tanner or vintner—leading to the granting of citizenship. A lot of the references underpinning them are to studies of the church in England. It is surprising that they did not set the church in Dublin in the wider context of recent work done on the Irish church, which showed that it was in surprisingly good order over much of Ireland, but especially in the Pale, and was experiencing a remarkable revival in its fortunes until Henry VIII divorced his first wife. There is a very interesting chapter on dramatic presentations in Dublin, which deals mainly with the religious plays and civic pageants that were so integral a part of life in late medieval Dublin.

The book finishes with a chapter highlighting continuities and changes in Dublin up to The economic material might have been better discussed in previous chapters, while much of the religious material is already familiar. Nonetheless, this is an impressive book by any standards. Dr Slattery has transformed our understanding of late medieval Dublin and its inhabitants in a most readable manner.
